A unique identifier known as the tracking number or code is assigned to each package, allowing for monitoring of its movement between countries or within a single country. These numbers can be either international or only traceable within the sender's country. The Universal Postal Union format for tracking numbers is RA123456789CN, where the first two letters denote the package type and the last two letters represent the country of origin code. Packages with such numbers can be tracked until delivery. Other shipments, handled by courier, transport, and logistics companies, may have varying tracking code formats like CTAF10000160477YQ or UPAAB000000251682107. However, these packages might not always be trackable in the recipient's country, requiring notification from the Post Office or a call from the courier company.
